Coming from a 13 year catering background where agile practices were employed way before it was a tech buzzword, I understand the need for good efficient teamwork where everyone works toward a unified goal. I understand the need to be self-sufficient, taking initiative where needed while effectively taking instruction and guidance from team leaders. I understand the value of learning to learn fast; be it by adapting to unknown situations, picking up new skills on the fly or simply solving troublesome problems. And lastly, I understand that good, clear, honest communication is the single most valuable quality a person can have.

With this, I have decided on a change of career; one where I can continue being creative, taking seemingly simple ideas and turning them into something amazing. I wanted to continue being pushed to solve complex problems building the solution one small layer at a time. I wanted to learn new skills which would provide exposure to a whole new world of possibilities.

This is why I chose to be a developer and I am looking forward to where this opportunity will lead.
